Letter from the Vicar

In this Year of Vocation, surely more than ever I can declare, "happy St Valentine's Day"! This is not mainly because of the historical Valentine, who was an early Roman martyr, about whom little is known. Quite apart from how he has ended up patron of sweethearts and over-priced red roses, I am not suggesting we are all called to martyrdom! Rather, it is a day potentially to do with love and that (you see) is very much about vocation: we are all called by God's love and called to love one another. I wonder what each of us honestly thinks about 14 February? I suppose I ought to start. I can remember older pupils at school being tasked with doing the classroom rounds and the disappointment of there being no card (violin strings please). On the other hand, I can remember one card with that classic question mark and to this day the author is a mystery (put the violins away then)! Now that I am married, of course the day comes far below wedding anniversary or birthday (yeah right, he's not going to get away with that, is he!) You see, it's a day of highs and lows, triumphs and disasters, sweetness and bitterness! Shall we be topical (oh no, you didn't want mention of this) and propose that the UK and the EU may not be exchanging sweet nothings this year; that they have fallen out of love with each other?! The fickleness and vagaries of governments, politics and public opinion may be rather a good analogy with romance and the affairs of the heart. And going back to historical Valentine, there are plenty of Leaver and Remainer martyrs: no, not civil war (God forbid), but the root meaning of "martyr"; that is, "witness". Well, as God is our witness, highs and lows and bittersweetness can also describe the life of faith. There are times on the journey with God, whether at the start or at other high points of spiritual experience, when all is fresh and joyful, bathed in light and hope. There are other times when we are spiritually dry or a bit stuck or weighed down by life's travails. Yet, if it is true between earthly lovers that even in the bitter times or the lows they stay faithful and true to one another and to the promises they made, then so it is in the life of faith: God loves us regardless, to the very end, and so we try to love Him back.

St Valentine blessings!

Mark Eminson
